Course Level	Bachelor Degree
Objective	This course aims to introduce students of International Relations into the growing research area of international migration. With this aim, the course will first present contemporary trends in international migration and refugee movements. The course will then provide a review of theoretical approaches to human mobility and the root causes of migration and refugee movements. As part of the course, we will also study international refugee law and the emerging global governance of migration and refugees, borders, border control and securitization of migration, Turkish migration policies and migration and asylum policies in the European Union.
