Objective	This course examines the reciprocal relationships between migration, space and society from the perspectives of sociology, geography and urban studies. It aims to help students understand the role of human mobility in social and spatial transformations, and to critically analyze inequalities, forms of belonging, social boundaries and processes of coexistence using key theories and concepts from migration studies.
Content	The course examines the links between migration and globalization, how migration transforms urban spaces, the role of cities in welcoming migrants, urban inequalities, spatial segregation, social integration, and diversity in public space. It also explores urban governance in the context of migration, policies of inclusion and exclusion, and transnational social relations. Theoretical readings are connected to urban observation exercises and a field visit to Tarlabaşı.
